Tips To Help Finance Your U.S. Education

As an international student, financing your higher education in the United States can be challenging but not impossible. In the end, you will evaluate your particular situation and decide whether the many benefits that an international education experience provides outweigh the costs. Here you will find tips to help you finance your U.S. studies.

Planning

It is essential that international students develop sound financial habits, such as establishing realistic budgets that take into account educational costs and living expenses. Living expenses include the cost of housing, transportation, food, clothing, books and other personal items. These expenses can vary greatly in the United States, depending on the region of the country where the student chooses to study. The U.S. government, the university's financial aid office, EducationUSA advisors located in cities around the world, and public libraries are useful sources for obtaining information on living expenses.

Reducing Costs

In addition to creating a realistic budget, there are several ways to reduce the costs of a U.S. education. One primary way is to choose universities and programs that are more cost effective, such as attending a university in a less expensive region of the U.S. Also, by participating in an exchange program through reciprocal exchange agreements, international students do not pay tuition at the host U.S. university. While in the exchange program, international students may continue to search for opportunities to transfer on a full time basis.

Another alternative is to attend a university that offers an accelerated program which allows transfer credits or advanced standing for studies completed in one's home country. Other types of accelerated programs allow students to take courses at less expensive community colleges during the summer or take an additional number of courses beyond what is required throughout the semester.

Students should also try to find additional ways to decreasing living expenses such as reducing housing costs by becoming a resident assistant in a dormitory or living off campus with a relative or friend. Many universities have international or language themed dormitories which seek to employ international students as residential assistants.

In addition to using personal funds, students should research what financial aid and employment options are available. Making informed decisions about financial aid can save students thousands of dollars in the future.

"I contribute academically and culturally to my country as I use what I learned in the US every time I step into the classroom"
University professor and former Rowe Fund beneficiary from Brazil

Financing your U.S. studies

Finding resourceful ways to locate scholarships and free aid requires wading through directories and guidebooks. While this type of aid tends to be highly competitive, it can earn you free tuition and more. Possible resources for free aid include government, corporate, and institutional sources in one's home country and in the United States, including but not limited to generous private sponsors, private foundations, charitable organizations, and family foundations. Since students are not required to pay back this money, they should apply for as many scholarships and fellowships for which they are eligible.

Part-time employment is another option to help finance higher education. International students may work part-time on and off campus. Let's not forget negotiating in-state tuition or a percentage of tuition waivers from the university in the U.S. In addition, some employers may be willing to fund their employee's studies. Loans should be considered a supplementary form of financial aid. Students should never borrow more than absolutely necessary and avoid commercial loans as much as possible. While the Organization of American States offers interest-free student loans (www.oas.org/en/rowefund) through the Rowe Fund program, there are several other student loan programs that allow students to borrow money and help fund their studies abroad.

We trust this "Financial Aid Guide for Studies in the United States" is a good start of your search for funding.

Pan American Fund

Who We Are

The Organization of American States (OAS), through the Rowe Fund program, provides financial aid in the form of interest-free loans to international students from Latin American and Caribbean countries enrolled in universities in the United States.

Our Vision

Promote intellectual and cultural exchange as well as friendship and understanding between the U.S. and people of the Americas.

Supplementary financial aid

The Rowe Fund grants interest-free loans of up to USD 15,000 to help cover a portion of students' tuition and/or living expenses. Given the revolving nature of the program, beneficiaries commit to repay the loan in full and return to their home country within a year of completing their studies.

International Exchange

Candidates must be enrolled in graduate studies, exchange programs, professional training, or the last two years of undergraduate studies at an accredited university in the United States. The programs should have a minimum duration of one semester (longer than four months) and should not exceed two years.

Application

There is no deadline to apply to the Rowe Fund. A candidate may apply at any time during the year and at any time during their studies once they have been accepted into a university in the United States. Online application, eligibility requirements, and forms can be found at: www.oas.org/en/rowefund.

Repayment

Loan repayment consists of fifty equal monthly payments. The first installment is due three months after the expected completion date of the studies for which the loan is approved, as specified in the loan agreement.

Administration

The Permanent Council of the Organization of American States is responsible for the administration of the Fund through a Committee comprised of four members of the Permanent Council and the Secretary General of the GS/OAS.

“ I was glad I came across the OAS Rowe financial aid, especially since the loans are interest-free. As a foreign student there aren't many scholarships available to me and I was on the verge of dropping out of school.”

A professional working in Public Health and former Rowe Fund beneficiary from Jamaica

“The Rowe Fund does a wonderful job and makes life a little easier for many people whose kids are away”.
